Some coaches prefer players who will just do whatever he tells them to. It's like, if you're at school with a load of 10-year-old boys and you tell them to jump, everyone will start to jump. But the intelligent boy will ask, 'Why should I jump? Why?' That can be difficult for a lot of coaches, and I understand that.

He went on Twitter and posted "impossible is nothing". He recovered and went to play for LA Galaxy in America which is a much easier league where most players go when they are about to retire but his motivation was to re-discover his form.
